ROBERT FROST

Modern American Poets and Their Printers

I too, dislike it: there are things that are important beyond all this fiddle.

Reading it, however, with a perfect contempt for it, one discovers in it after all, a place for the genuine.

So begins Marianne Moore's poem in which she explores the values of poetry. Moore was part of a tremendous flowering of creativity in the arts that was linked to modern life and, more specifically, new ways of writing poetry in the 20th century. This exhibition focuses on a selection of poets who broke away from the Romantic traditions of the 19th century. It also explores the independent, literary publishers who printed innovative writing because it was their passion. The exhibition begins with the expatriate writers in Paris of the 1920's, who exuberantly lived and wrote in an avant-garde style, making it difficult for them to get work published by established firms. Instead, they were befriended, supported and printed by small publishers dedicated to helping new voices be heard. One of the printers of the expatriates was William "Bill" Bird, a Trinity graduate, who eventually sold his collection of these writers to the college. Similarly, the Beat poets of the 1950's and 60's and other independent American poets of the 70's and after have been published by small literary presses.

Many of the presses in the exhibition shared the desire to print the work of promising yet largely unknown writers, an approach requiring a discerning ear for poetry and a willingness to take risks. Some of the presses were even run by the poets themselves. Other selections in the show are by established poets published in special editions by major fine printers, such as the Robert Frost holiday cards produced at the Spiral Press. And finally, toward the end of the century, some printers ventured into work that married text and image in a collaborative effort between artist, printer and poet.
